Roblox is an online platform that allows users to create their own 3D games and experiences using a drag and drop interface. Users can create their own games and experiences that are similar in style to YouTube channel creator and Nintendo development studio Double Fine Productions. In addition to its free version, Roblox has an optional premium membership service that gives players access to more than 10 additional features, including access to the developer console, the ability to instantly create games, and unique game creation tools. Roblox was founded by former university students David Baszucki and Erik Cassel in 2004 and was initially backed by Venture Frogs, Silicon Valley Bank, and Acequia Technology. The initial growth of Roblox was funded by over $28 million in Series A funding that was led by KPCB and included Joust Ventures, Greylock Partners, Venture Frogs, and Kline Ventures. Roblox is a "sandbox" platform, allowing players to create their own content without the need for game designers to create the world from scratch. Game objects, such as characters, vehicles, weapons, and buildings, are created using a drag and drop interface in the user-programmed blocks of code that represent a game's environment. When combined with the physics engine, players can easily create game objects that can be interacted with. Roblox also includes a programming language called Lua, similar to Java, that allows players to write their own code that programs objects such as characters, vehicles, weapons, and more. This code can be then used in future games on Roblox. Popular trends in the early 2010s have included the popularity of "fake" or "blox" (a portmanteau of "block" and "roblox"), a slang term coined by the game to describe creative players who build works of art using game-related elements. Games-related activities on Roblox also have been popular, such as building "robots" out of Lego-like blocks. A project to build a large-scale recreation of the Play-Doh brand, called Play-Doh Factory, was created on Roblox in 2008. History Roblox was developed in the framework of a top-down method, wherein the main stakeholders (the creators of the platform) also have a hand in the development of the specific implementation of the framework. This design, in accordance with the
